4.Go to "Vray/presets/" folder and import as or 5.If it's not in the same folder, Download VrayFX. *Notes*1.Check the pipeline size if it's just a few megabyte, the size depends on the file size you are creating. In general you can set 1 - 2 GB as the pipeline size.2.Check the subsurface settings and adjust the subsurface step if necessary.4.Modify the emitter and factor/atmosphere settings as you like.6.The render settings below are mainly for interiors. The render settings for exteriors can be found in the Render Setting description of outdoor rendering tutorial.2.Composite Presets is a convenient way to apply the render settings to a project. Comp Presets will apply those settings to all selected objects.3.For more effective render time: create a new comp presets and apply that to all your scene, usually will reduce render time by 50%. if not, you can combine all the files in a single comp, then export all the comp you need, then use a new comp to import and render your project. in this way, you will not need to adjust each and every render settings so you can make use of the optimized settings in most cases.however, if you have more than one project you need to render. You will have to have a new comp preset for each of your project, this will cause the render settings to be redundant and the render time to increase, but the render settings are saved in comp presets to be used for the same scene again in the future. 3ds max V-ray full-res render settings download A: 3D SkyBox is just a cube with a plane. The image you posted is a Vray skybox, which is a shader with multiple camera views. It's the same thing, just with the plugin. If you want to make it 3D, a simple cube is all you need. I used some black and white mesh for the clouds in the example below (in V-Ray), but this could easily be a simple color mesh too. If it's a solid color, it will show up only as a glossy object. If it's fully transparent, it will show as a transparent object. A: A skybox is a little different in that it's generally going to be a texture on a geometry rather than a
