The issue of talent development in sports has arisen recently. In some sports (for instance ice hockey) there are talent development programs that take place after years of regular participation. However, in some other sports (e.g., canoe sprint, athletics and orienteering) there are no formal programs. Both ice hockey and canoe sprint are suggested to be important for society and national prestige (Arnott-Stone and Jones, 2002; Wilson, 1987). This study uses data from 800th World Championship races in canoe sprint to examine the problem. It investigates the effect of the relative birth month of the athletes on their performance. In addition to being a very popular sport, canoe sprint is a sport with a high level of training and development. It is a sport where we expect to find effects, because of the importance of its status in society and the fact that it is not a team sport like soccer, where there may be some task organisation that might reduce the effect. If there is any effect, we should be able to detect it in a sport like this, where all the athletes are relatively able to become good at it. The findings ba244e880a
