Hurricane "Irma" Becomes Category 5 As It Slams Into Florida Trump: "We're monitoring it very closely" Tampa, Florida (CNN) — As Irma – a storm now classified as a "major hurricane" – intensified over the Gulf of Mexico, it became the biggest threat to the United States since Hurricane Wilma in 2005, which killed 31 people. The storm was downgraded to Category 3, a category that forecasters say could grow much stronger. As of Saturday morning, Irma had maximum sustained winds of 115 mph and was about 1,000 miles east-southeast of the eastern tip of Florida, the National Hurricane Center said. It is moving west-northwest at 14 mph and is expected to remain at this motion for the next 24 hours, with an increase of about 5 mph during the next day. Forecasters said the storm was very likely to remain a Category 3 hurricane when it makes landfall on Sunday or Monday and that it was almost certain to remain a Category 3 hurricane when it makes landfall, although that's still a day to two days out. Hurricane Irma is currently "under very efficient steering" to the west of the U.S. East Coast, and forecasters said the northward motion should continue through the weekend, taking Irma across the Southeast U.S. Irma is expected to pass near or over parts of Florida, Georgia and the Carolinas on Sunday and Monday before turning back over the open ocean. The storm will bring dangerous wind and water conditions and heavy rainfall to Florida, Georgia and the Carolinas beginning Sunday. And, "Irma is expected to produce storm surge, hurricane-force winds, torrential rains and life-threatening flash floods across the Southeast U.S. coasts," according to a post on the National Hurricane Center's website. Irma could potentially weaken as it passes the United States 4bc0debe42
